Jensen Huang resigns from Nvidia, and its shares plunge

The chipmaker's stock fell as much as 14 percent after its longtime chief stepped down over affairs, sending tremors through global markets.

Jensen Huang resigned on Thursday as chief executive of Nvidia, the chip-making colossus he had long led, The New York Times reported. He admitted to an affair with a woman an identified as a spy for China, and he was also said to have had a relationship with an executive who reported to him.

Nvidia's shares plummeted as much as 14 percent after the announcement, The Times said, shaking up tech stocks and sending tremors through global markets. Earlier in the day, Investing.com reported the stock had already tumbled more than 7 percent in premarket trading on a report that the board was preparing to oust him.

Nasdaq futures retreated and U.S. and European chip stocks dipped on the report, Investing.com said, though European shares still hit record highs as investors sought defensive stocks. The Japan Times had reported that the scandal was fueling calls in Washington to tighten semiconductor export controls, and that Chinese A.I. firms were rushing to secure Nvidia chip capacity.

The resignation comes as President Trump and China's leader, Xi Jinping, prepare to meet next week in Shenzhen to discuss trade. Trump has said he does not plan to raise the Nvidia affair there. In China's spy operations, a Times report noted, romance can be a long game.

COMING UP

NEXT WEEK – President Trump and Xi Jinping are to meet in Shenzhen to discuss trade. Trump has said he does not plan to raise the Nvidia affair there.

MARCH – Goldman Sachs added a March rate hike to its Federal Reserve forecast after another hot inflation reading.

IRAN – Trump said he is pulling Vice President Vance off the Iran talks, writing, "We don't need a deal with Iran."

MARKETS

NVIDIA — NOV. 12

Shares fell as much as 14 percent after Huang resigned, The Times said. Nasdaq futures retreated on the news.

EUROPE AND OIL — NOV. 12

European shares hit record highs as defensive appeal offset the Nvidia shock. Oil was volatile on worries over Iran peace efforts.

BANK OF JAPAN — NOV. 12

An A.I. slump is not seen affecting the BOJ's rate-rise plan. One increase every three months is still forecast, The Japan Times said.

IN BRIEF

IRAN TALKS — FYI

Trump is pulling Vance off the talks to focus on a fraud campaign, deepening questions about his plan to end the war.

BROOKLYN — FYI

At least eight people died when a three-story building in Flatbush collapsed. More than a dozen were injured.

WASHINGTON — FYI

Several people were shot in Logan Circle, near the White House. Police said a suspect was barricaded in a building.

The World: A.I. and market whiplash

Also, the China-U.S. spy war rages.

BY KATRIN BENNHOLD

Good morning, world. Last week's midterm elections were perhaps the first major elections fought at least in part over issues related to artificial intelligence. This year saw record donations from tech executives to tech-friendly candidates. And in some cases, A.I. was actually on the ballot: In local ballot initiatives across the country, people voted to limit or prevent the development of data centers. Many newly elected Democrats have promised A.I. regulation.

If A.I. has surged to the forefront of U.S. politics, it's in part because A.I. is at the forefront of the U.S. economy. And stock markets around the world rise and fall with A.I. shares, particularly the multitrillion-dollar behemoths based in Silicon Valley. I spoke to my colleague Joe Rennison, who covers financial markets, about the dramatic swings in tech stocks following the midterms and what they mean – for Americans, and for the rest of us.

Markets up. Markets down. Markets up …?

So, Joe. We've seen some serious volatility in the stock market after the midterms. First markets rallied, then they had their worst day in nearly two years. This week, as Nvidia stock plunged because of the Jensen Huang affair, the rest of the market bounced back. What's going on, and how much of all this is down to politics?

Certainly some of it is down to politics. The initial rally after the midterms came in part from investors who had parked their cash on the sidelines, in case of some unexpected event – say, a contested election. They bought back in when it became evident we were going to get a clear outcome.

The plunge the next day, though, came after some weaker than expected financial reports from a couple of A.I. companies, and after investors began processing what Democratic control of Congress and some Democratic wins at the state level might actually mean for the A.I. industry.

But markets have rallied since and now seem to be trying to find some equilibrium. I haven't yet spoken to any professional investor who thinks we're at the start of a more severe downturn. It's more that perhaps the first leg of A.I. development, characterized by astronomical growth (and stock returns), may be slowing.

What are investors worried about?

Many people were already worried about the rapid growth in A.I. slowing down ahead of the midterms, and whether the huge amount of spending by A.I. companies would result in big profits any time soon.

EDITOR'S SUMMARY: Rennison goes on to say Democratic wins in data-center states then made high A.I. stock prices harder to justify. Ten companies make up about 40 percent of the S&P 500, he notes, but most regulation plans aim to slow A.I., not stop it. South Korea's Kospi fell over 10 percent after the vote, then rebounded.

Live for 44 hours in 3 states: What Omar Jimenez heard from voters

He shares the conversations that surprised him the most on the road.

BY OMAR JIMENEZ

Editor's note: Omar Jimenez traveled to more than 16 cities and towns, livestreaming for more than 40 hours. We asked him what he heard along the way:

Of all the places you visited and people you met, what surprised you the most?

Omar: What surprised me the most was how talkative the students were at every campus we went to – the University of Michigan, University of Pittsburgh and Ohio State University. If you watched the stream, you'll see I was largely just approaching students at random as they left class and asking about the issues that matter most to them.

I remember being a student, and if a stranger approached me with a camera and microphone asking about politics in any way, I'd turn the music up louder on my headphones and keep walking. For being put on the spot in the way they were, these students were incredibly poised, thoughtful, and willing to delve into their political motivations intelligently on a dime.

EDITOR'S SUMMARY: Jimenez goes on to say people on both sides felt campaign ads had become too personal. Streaming live with no edits won over skeptics, and he says many people just want to be heard.

Opinion Today: Democrats, take the deal

This Congress can make a down payment on affordability.

FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Congress can cut costs and help the climate. "The rules have become so complex and restrictive that the country cannot build the future it needs. This complexity feeds cynicism about whether government can get anything done." – The editorial board

The right has two paths out of this. "The distance between these two camps is so wide that, at this point, neither side believes the other can legitimately claim the moniker 'conservative.'" – Oren Cass, a contributing Opinion writer

EDITOR'S SUMMARY: Anand Giridharadas mocks Huang's fall from the leather-jacket set. David Wallace-Wells argues the political center of gravity is Obama, not Trump. Mike Murphy writes that more cash is not what Republicans needed, and Frank Bruni and Bret Stephens ask when we can stop talking about Trump.

THE JAPAN TIMES · THE EXTRA

Dig it. Buried treasures from the JT archives.

The elephant in the lake. Believe it or not, elephants once roamed Japan … and then they disappeared. At Lake Nojiri in Nagano Prefecture, amateur archaeologists and professionals – young and old alike – are hunting for the reason why. Their findings could rewrite the history of humankind on the archipelago. (Talisker Scott Hunter, 2023)

Tokyo's buried past. What lies beneath a city that never stops tearing itself down? Tokyo's past has survived for centuries under cranes and concrete, but preserving it can be a tough sell when profit usually wins. (Alex K.T. Martin, 2024)

The Jomon, unearthed. Japan's prehistoric Jomon left behind pottery, shell mounds and a masterclass in living alongside nature. An archaeologist who has spent a career piecing the society together fields 20 questions on how they lived and what they left behind. (Alex Ehrenreich, 2022)

EDITOR'S SUMMARY: The Extra is a free fortnightly pick of archive stories, and all three pieces in this issue can be read without a subscription.

THIS WEEK'S ALERTS

Brooklyn toll rises to eight, and Trump's 2021 letter to Biden surfaces

Brooklyn. At least eight people died in a building collapse in Flatbush, and the collapse sheared off the wall of another building, leaving an apartment exposed. Mississippi. Democrat Scott Colom won his Senate race; he will be the state's first Black senator in nearly 150 years. Indonesia. The vice president is stepping down.

A letter. Trump told Biden in a 2021 note, "I know how much you love the American people." Biden details the letter in a new book; The Times says its warm tone is at odds with Trump's public comments. Washington. The White House warned congressional Democrats that aggressive oversight could be a crime.

Markets. Investing.com's Thursday digest led with Nvidia shares slumping on a report that the board was preparing to oust Huang. Alibaba also slumped, and an analysis piece warned again about A.I. funding at SoftBank. Obituaries. Judge Richard A. Posner died at 87.

THE TOWN

RECOMMENDED

'Godzilla Minus Zero'

Takashi Yamazaki's new Godzilla film is in theaters. The Japan Times review says the visual effects go even further than before, while the human drama is overplayed.

'Three Millimeters to You'

Chun Jin-rung's first feature is a cross-cultural first-love story in the Japanese "seishun eiga" youth-film genre. The Japan Times calls it sentimental in places but genuinely sweet.

ON THE TOWN

'The Master and Margarita'

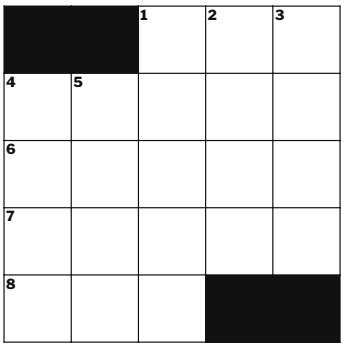

The New National Theatre, Tokyo, is staging Mikhail Bulgakov's novel. The Japan Times says the Tokyo audience, too, is under the spotlight.

'Vivant' heads to the big screen

The hit spy drama is becoming a film, after a second season that sparked controversy in China over its portrayal of a fictional intelligence agency.

DEAR TIMES

Should I stop tapping my Suica two years early?

Dear Times, JR East says that from spring 2028, people with the Suica Mobile app will be able to walk through special gates at 40 stations without tapping. I have been tapping a card at the same gate for years, and I like the beep. Should I keep tapping until the new gates arrive, or start practicing the no-tap walk now?

— Holdout in Tokyo

Dear Holdout, Keep tapping. The new gates are not here yet, and the old ones still need a card. There is no prize for rehearsing a walkthrough two years early.

When the special gates do open, the no-tap path is only for the mobile app, and only at those 40 stations. Until then, the beep is still the official procedure.

TRADE YOUTH CHIP GATE · TRUCE

WANTED

Lost: Elephants, Nagano Area

Last seen near Lake Nojiri a very long time ago. Volunteers with trowels are searching the lakebed and would welcome any leads. No reward, but the finder may rewrite a chapter of history.

Witnesses to a Final Tap

An oral-history project seeks commuters willing to describe touching a Suica card to a ticket gate. JR East plans gates that need no tap at 40 stations from 2028, and the gesture should be recorded while people still remember it.

FOR SALE

Ocean Liner, Lightly Submerged

Historic supership, now converting to reef. Current residents are fish. Viewing by appointment and scuba only.

I.P.O. Ticket, Lightly Marked Down

Anthropic had been discussed at $2 trillion and is now aiming for $1.4 trillion. Still a highly sought-after listing, The Times says. No refunds if more air comes out.

NOTICES

Kaiju Advisory for Cinemas

With 'Godzilla Minus Zero' in theaters, the ward reminds residents that all reported destruction is limited to the screen. Please keep popcorn away from the monster.

Lower House Seat-Cut Notice

The LDP, JIP and DPP have submitted a bill to reduce seats. Opposition parties say the plan will make it harder for smaller parties to win. Public comment is informal and already underway.
